THE CHALLENGE

Safety is often described as a top priority in construction, but the reality on many jobsites tells a different story. When schedules are tight and crews are short, hiring decisions often shift toward speed instead of safety. In these moments, the focus can move to filling roles quickly rather than ensuring workers have a proven track record of safe behavior.

Over time, those decisions begin to show up through near misses, recordables, rework, and inconsistent crew performance. Safety does not start on site, it starts before day one with the people brought onto the job. When hiring processes are not structured to evaluate real safety behavior, even strong safety programs struggle to deliver consistent results.

THE REAL IMPACT

Hiring gaps do not just affect staffing, they impact overall jobsite performance:

Increased Safety Risk

Unverified workers introduce higher exposure to incidents

Schedule Disruptions

Rework and safety issues slow progress and impact timelines

Inconsistent Crew Performance

Lack of alignment creates variability across teams

Operational Strain

Supervisors spend more time correcting behavior than executing work

WHY IT MATTERS

When safety is built into the hiring process, crews operate more consistently, risks are reduced, and projects stay on track. A proactive approach creates stronger alignment between safety expectations and real behavior on site.

THE SOLUTION

Safer jobsites start with a more intentional hiring strategy.

Key Focus Areas:

- Make safety expectations clear from the start
- Screen for real safety behavior, not just experience
- Verify history with past supervisors
- Confirm performance early on site
